

The Spread of Agriculture in Building Cuisines

The Spread of Agriculture in Building Cuisines

The transition from gathering plant foods and hunting animals to growing plant foods and raising animals is complex, having occurred at different times and speeds and to different extents among human societies. Some human societies remained committed to hunting and gathering into the late 20th century, even though they were aware of domesticated plants and animals and could have transitioned to agriculture. How and why people adopted agriculture initially, and why specific crops or animals might have been readily accepted while others were ignored, are complex questions that archaeologists address in many times and places.